During World War II, the Poles maintained a Government in-Exile in London. Written in the form of a Socratic dialogue, Halevi develops a philosophy of history in an attempt to show the insufficiency of theological conclusions arrived at by rationalistic means. His underlying principle is that God cannot be found or conceived by reason, but rather by an intuition peculiar to Semitic peoples. It is this divine intuition ("al'amir al-ilahi") in the Arabic original or "he-emeth ha-Telo-hi" in Tibbon's Hebrew which may bring one to the highest spiritual level, that is, prophecy.
